Dear Harold,

I just received your most recent letter. You imply that I have no right to judge whether or not you have immediate need of any manuscripts of yours that I may have. All manuscripts that I have are copies that I made from originals that I returned to you. Hence my copies were never in your possession, and hence I will return them only because you don't wish me to have copies -- not because they are your property. The copyright is clearly yours, but copies that I make are technically mine, and I will send them to you when I get around to it which will most likely be after my return from Europe.

(over)

Best wishes,

Jerry
